I was watching the news on TV the other day and they were reporting on this guy who had gone out and raped, killed and mutilated and bunch a school girls. A couple of things come to mind when you hear a tragic story such as this. Why is it that we only remember the name of the criminal and never the name of any of the victims? We all know Charles Manson but nobody can tell you just whom in fact he killed. Or try and name a few of Jeffrey Dahmer's victims? They also stated that when the police went to his home they found pornographic material. Then there was this editorial stating how bad pornographic material was and that it should be banned. Not that I'm for pornographic material, especially after that last batch of pictures; they never can get my "good side" But what about the guy who goes out and kills a black person, or a Jewish person, or blows up an abortion clinic, and when the police go to his house and find a Christian bible or teaching from Mohamed, they never say that we should ban all religious materials? Maybe it's just me, but I really don't see that big of a difference here.
